EDUCATION & TRAINING

You'll need some training to work as an electrician. Most people get their training from apprenticeship programs. These programs take about 4 years to complete. They include both classroom lessons and on-the-job training. You will likely need a high school diploma to apply.

Many apprenticeships are offered by unions and trade associations. Some large employers may also be able to train you. However, this option is less common.

You may want to take some other training before you enter an apprenticeship. Technical schools and 2-year colleges offer a range of courses and programs. You can study electricity or a related area. This extra training is not required. But, it may give you an edge when you apply to an apprenticeship program.

In most states, electricians are required to be licensed. Exact licensing criteria vary from area to area. However, you will likely need to pass an exam. Local employers, unions, and trade groups can tell you more about the training.
